PERHAPS KOLU
PERHAPS NOT

At first sight a hippopotamus appears to be the most grotesque animal on earth. But the features that give him his strange appearance are actually very useful to him and the life he lives

The nostrils, protruding eyes and the ears are set on the upper surface of the flat face so that they alone stick out above the water as the "hippo" swims. This leaves his great body hidden beneath the surface. In a way, the "hippo" is very much like a submarine with his own built-in periscope.

The enormous mouth works like a giant scoop shovel as it gathers in plants from the bottoms of rivers and lakes. His barrel-shaped body is perfectly designed for swimming under water.

The name hippopotamus means "river-horse," and along with the rhinoceros is the largest land mammal next to the elephant.

A fully grown "hippo" can reach up to 14 feet in length, stand five feet tall and weigh as much as four tons!

The hippopotamus is a thick skinned animal. His hide is one and a half inches thick and provides good protection for him. There is no hair on his body, except strangely at the tip of his tail.

The mouth not only has teeth, but tusks as well stand up from his lower jaw. The natives hunt the "hippo" for its teeth which are superior to ivory in hardness.

The "hippo" can stay under water for around ten minutes, and can close his nostrils and ears when venturing into the depths. Then, if comes to the surface, snorting and splashing.

A strange thing occurs when a "hippo" gets excited. His body becomes covered in a reddish fluid and he almost seems to change color. This is where the old expression "sweats blood" comes from, but there is no blood in this red fluid.

The hippopotamus prefers to hunt for food at night and will travel long distances in search of a good grass pasture. Often he makes a serious mistake and finds a native garden or cultivated fields.

This can be very dangerous, not only for the "hippo" but the natives as well. The native's first instinct is to kill the intruder, but he must do it with his first shot, because a wounded hippopotamus becomes a savage animal. He will charge his attackers, oblivious to bullets.

The speed of this bulky, barrel-shaped animal is unbelievable. He can often reach his attackers before they can take aim and shoot again.

Even if he is wounded while still in the water, a hippopotamus will submerge and swim under water until he reaches the river's edge. Then he will leave the water and gallop full speed toward his tormentors. Combined with speed and the element of surprise, the "hippo" often comes out the victor in such battles.

But in spite of all this the hippopotamus is basically timid and nonviolent. Unless he is angry or wounded, he prefers to leave well enough alone. He is not a meat eater and therefore not interested in killing for food or sport.

His enormous jaws can hold a bale of hay, and his long tusks root up grass like a steam shovel.

Because of their calm nature, the "hippo" can be kept easily in captivity. They are on display in zoos all over the world and often become quite friendly toward the people who visit them there.

It is a delight to visit the hippopotamus at feeding time and watch those great jaws open up as it catches the food tossed its way.

The hippopotamus can still be found living in its wild state in Africa. They are mainly found down around the equator. They move in herds and often there are as many as twenty or thirty of them together in the water. They stay in the water all day and come out when the hot sun goes down.

Often, as the sun sets behind the African hills, you can see them lumbering along toward some field of grass and in general minding their own business.
